Famed anthropologist, Mary Douglas, reminds us that “food is not feed.” Although we must eat to survive, food cannot be separated from our cultures and traditions, sense of preference and taste, the globalization of our diet, debates about nutrition and food security, agricultural practices, food labor, and the influence of identity and otherized boundaries on our daily meals. In this course, we will draw on these and other topics to consider the complex politics of food in our everyday lives, social engagements, and global interactions.

Instructor: Sarah Renkert
sarahrenkert@email.arizona.edu